CHANGES IN MIDDLE - EAST, ISRAEL - THAILAND RELATIONSHIP

Israeli Ambassador H.E Dr. Meir Schlomo treated us to fun and fact-filled presentation on his homeland and "Changes in Middle - East, Israel - Thailand relationship. While he covered a great many projects in which Israel is now a world-leader ranging from milk production to agriculture, what caught most of our attention was the extent to which Israel is the leader in internet security and the support it gives all of us daily as we go about our on-line lives.

With this in mind, more information about the southern Israeli city of Beer Sheva and its more modern role might be of interest.

The city used to protect the frontier and during Roman times, it was a dusty outpost that formed part of the Limes Arabicus, a series of desert fortresses defending the empire from raiding tribes. Earlier, the Bible repeatedly cited Beer Sheva as the southern civilized limit of the Israelite kingdoms.

Even today, tourists in Beer Sheva can visit the remains of the fortress that guarded the borders of biblical Israel. But today the frontier is the internet and Beer Sheva offers protection of the electronic sort. The city is rapidly becoming a global center of cyber security technology.

Israel exports more cyber security-related products and services than all other countries in the world combined, excluding the US. Reports from 2015 show the tiny country making 10% of all global sales in cyber security products and attracting 20% of global investment in the sector.

Much of that investment is centered on the desert city of Beer Sheva, where Israel has constructed a hub for cyber security research and development. Those investments are bolstered by the city's physical proximity to Israel's military technological intelligence units and the burgeoning Ben Gurion University, a significant research institution.

At an early stage, Israel found cyber security as an area of national importance. The small country's technological skills and continuous concerns over security made cyber security a natural arena for national investment.

In 2010, Israel adopted its National Cyber Initiative, which set up a National Cyber Bureau to advise the government on cyber security matters, encouraging co-operation between academia, industry and the defense community, and advancing Israel as a global center of cyber technology.

Since then, the bureau has, in co-operation with other government agencies, allocated $100m to foster entrepreneurship and academic excellence in the field. The Israeli Office of the Chief Scientist, another government agency, has adopted a preferential policy for funding private initiatives in cyber security research and development.

In addition to the Beer Sheva center, the bureau has also helped to set up a second academic cyber security center at Tel-Aviv University. This latter center has a broad interdisciplinary focus, which includes political science and legal issues.
